

Does religion unite us or divide us?

Delegates to cast their vote at Conference in Sydney

Media Release: 23 October 2018 With religious freedom a hot-button topic in Australia's social and political agenda, delegates at the International Metropolis Conference, Sydney, will cast their vote in a moderated debate on whether the religious affiliations of migrants create bridges or barriers to belonging. Metropolis 2018 – to be held at ICC Sydney, 29 October to 2 November 2018 – is the only platform to bring together international, national and local migration experts and practitioners to highlight the latest research, challenges, insights and successes in migration, diversity and integration. Issues around religion loom large in discussions of migrants and integration in contemporary Australia and, indeed, across the world. Public discourse around migrants and religion commonly focus on perceived differences and barriers to pluralism. While religious affiliation can provide bonds and bridges that increase a migrant's sense of belonging, the Pew Research Center Australia reports to have seen a continued rise in social hostilities involving religion. The vote on the topic "Religion divides us more than it unites us" will follow a robust debate including leading thinkers Jawad Syed (Lahore University, Pakistan), Peggy Levitt (Wellesley College, USA), Farida Fozdar (The University of Western Australia) and Sunil Badami (author, Australia). Dr Simon Longstaff (Executive Director of The Ethics Centre, Australia) will moderate the debate. Conference Chair, current Telstra Australian Business Women of the Year and CEO of Settlement Services International, Violet Roumeliotis, said the debate will be an engaging way to wrestle with a hard issue. "This debate will bring together both sides of the argument in a professional and entertaining way. "Delegates will experience a kind of discourse we don't often get to see in the media and politics. This is about ideas, about people and how we live together. "I'm anticipating this debate will be one of the highlights of the Metropolis Conference, and a session not to be missed", said Ms Roumeliotis. The Debate: Religion divides us more than it unites us, will be held on Friday 2 November 2018 at the International Metropolis Conference, Sydney.
