

Legal technology company Lawcadia launches new intelligent engine

When every legal team and law firm want something different, Lawcadia's new platform engine is a game changer for the diverse appetites of the legal industry.

October 14, 2020 - Lawcadia, Australia's leading provider of matter and spend management solutions for in-house legal teams and their law firms, has announced the launch of a new intelligent engine that will drive all aspects of its platform.

Lawcadia Intelligence™ incorporates machine learning with business logic and no-code automation, providing a powerful engine for Lawcadia's end-to-end operating system.

Its new plugin architecture allows for rapid product development, giving customers, partners and Lawcadia's own development team the ability to build new plugins quickly.

Founder and CEO Warwick Walsh said the new engine was designed to help cater to the individual needs of every in-house legal team and law firm, from functionality and processes to integration with existing systems.

"Efficiency and control is a key focus for in-house legal teams, whilst law firms are seeking solutions that embed client relationships and add tangible value to their service offering," he said.

"Technology is crucial to success in these areas, however many ideas and initiatives fall over because there is too much cost and complexity in customisations and getting different systems working together or alongside each other."

Mr Walsh said the new platform enabled Lawcadia to meet these different requirements without the large implementation costs, but while retaining security.

"Lawcadia Intelligence™ has been in development for 12 months," he said.

"We are incredibly proud of our team and are excited to see where our clients can take our platform and what problems they can now solve using our technology."

Lawcadia's initial platform release focuses on logic-based procurement, workflow and task automation to assist in-house legal teams to get even greater control over spend and internal processes.

Law firms will also be able to streamline and customise its client intake, helping to elevate and embed key relationships.
