

Windows XP End of Support on 8 April 2014. What does this mean for you and your business?

Consumers and businesses that continue with Windows XP will be at risk of security threats, data protection issues and will not have access to online or telephone technical support from Microsoft once April 8 passes

Have you started migration to a modern desktop? After thirteen great years, Microsoft is on the cusp of ending support for the iconic Windows XP operating system and Office 2003. From April 8th, Microsoft will be ending support, which includes software updates, security patches as well as technical support. Businesses still using the platform are being encouraged to upgrade to modern versions of Windows and Office.

Over 1.5 million devices in Australia are still running Windows XP and it's estimated that a significant proportion of these are in smaller businesses. Microsoft has released newer versions of Windows since Windows XP, which are far more capable of addressing today's security risks as well as providing modern technology tools to help its customers run their businesses better.

Retiring a product is a normal part of the product lifecycle. Windows XP was released in October 2001, and its development began in the late 1990s. While most Microsoft software is supported for 10 years, Windows XP has been supported for more than 12 years, longer than any other Windows version.
